ABSTRACT

Many impact investors and fund managers such as Symbiotics recognise that, in order to enhance the development impacts of their investments, there is need to build the capacity of investees to bridge knowledge gaps and ensure adherence with sectors' best practices and principles. The capacity building takes the form of technical assistance grants to support invested financial institution to develop new products to reach under-served markets and generate both social impact (through expanded financial inclusion) and commercial impact (through customer acquisition and increased revenues).
